

of the Boston Atlas gives the following of the close of the trial of Mr.

Israel, on the rendition of the verdict that they should move for an arrest and a new trial. Nothing but the Governor, however, will keep him in the penitentiary. And even if this were it would scarcely avail. He is in Virginia, for aiding four slaves to escape that State, and there is a warrant in the officers here (issued on the refusal of the Governor of Virginia.) If he is pardoned in Maryland, he would be taken to Virginia; and, from what would no doubt be convicted there. The punishment in that State is twenty-one years—making in the four cases, years! Under the circumstances nothing left, in the choice of evils, but the penitentiary, in Maryland. It is hoped, that this case will be a warning, and that no similar attempt will be made by the abolitionists. Let them be as do their cause great injury, and do to the slave by such efforts, which at last will be very partially successful, and which are too great for any prudent counter."
